A Nicer Way to Numb!

While we can't do away with the needles just yet, advances in the administration of local anesthetics are still being made. Onset Buffering is one of the newest ways that we are able to make the numbing process more comfortable for patients. By buffering the anesthetic, patients are able to become numb more quickly and more profoundly, thus reducing the time that patients feel pain. As a result, the dentist is able to use less medication to get the patient numb, creating a more favorable numbing experience for both the patient and dental practice.
